that, I. demonstr. pron. ille, illa, illud, iste, ista, istud (ille, without being in opp. to hic, often used when we speak of something very well known, very celebrated, of any thing or person remote as regards time or place, but present in the mind of the speaker; iste = —, often when we speak of a third person or thing, with the idea of contempt or disapproval, — man there), alter (= the other of two; pl. alteri, if we speak of several on the other side); is, ea, id, hic, haec, hoc; those who, illi qui or (the relative clause preceding) qui, ii; — or, the word — not expressed, e.g. jacet corpus dormientis ut mortui (= as — of a dead man); — is my father, hic est meus pater; — only is true friendship, haec demum est amicitia firma; often by sic, e.g. — is his way, sic est ingenium ejus; = such a one, etc., is, ea, id; of — age, id aetatis; at — time, id temporis; we are at — age, id jam aetatis sumus. II. rel. pron. qui, quae, quod; see

WHO. III. conj. to connect the main clause, A, when the sentence with — contains the subject of the copula in the main sentence; 1, when the sentence with — conveys a general idea, rendered by the inf., e.g. officiū est, etc., or by another noun, e.g. nihil suavius est quam amari or amor, = nothing is more pleasing than — one should be loved; 2, use the accus. and inf., after “it is pleasing, grievous, probable, clear, manifest, evident, true, it appears, it is useful, right, reasonable, necessary, lawful, it is allowed —”; after several of these impersonal verbs, use also quod and ut, see under C and D (e.g. it is pleasing to hear — you are well, gratum est te valere); 3, than —, as —, inf. with an adv. or another noun with an adj. or part., e.g. nulla res tanto erat damno, etc., quam (a noun with an adj. or part.). B, when the sentence with — contains the object of the verb of the main clause, use acc. and inf.; 1, this is the case after alīa verba sensuum et affectuum, to which belong also “to know, conceive, remind, expect, hope, fear, believe,” etc.; then also after fac, when it is = inge, fancy —, etc., fac qui ego sum esse te; after the verb “to hope, swear, promise, threaten,” we use the accus. and fut. infin., only after “to hope” we use the accus. and pres. infin. when we speak of anything referring to the present time, and the accus. and perf. infin. when we speak of anything past; 2, after the so-called verba declarandi, as “to say, tell, indicate, remember, convince, teach, prove (efficere),” etc.; 3, also after “to fix, determine, wish, forbid, suppose, concede (that anything is so),” etc., the infin., if the sentence with — declares the object, whilst if it contains a wish or intention, we use ut; after “they,” “the people say,” “it is reported,” etc. (dicunt, tradunt, ferunt, produunt, perhibent), either by accus. and infin., or the nom. and indic. (of the passive voice), e.g. dicunt Romulum primum regem Romanum fuisse, or Romulus primus rex Romanorum fuisse dicebatur; dicunt vos adfuisse, or vos dicebamini adfuisse; after dubito, in the sense “I doubt not,” we find in Cic. always quin. C, when the sentence with — contains a description of anything or a circumst., 1, of the subject, when we can put “which” instead of “—,” by quod, as after “there is reason,” or “there is no reason,” (which, etc.), est (habeo), non est, nihil est quod (we may also use cui, as in English); also after “it is pleasing, rejoicing, I am glad, it is painful,” etc. (e.g. nihil est quod [i.e. illud quod] timeas); also after “we must add (eo or huc accedit),” where we use quod when we speak of a matter of fact, and ut when we refer to anything that is only in progress, always when the thing is only about to happen; 2, of the object when — = “because;” also by quod after “to be glad, rejoice (gaudere), to feel sorry, grieve (dolere), to wonder (mirari),” etc., where we use quod when we speak of a definite fact, but si, if we speak of something merely imaginary or as we suppose it; 3, when — stands for “inasmuch as, inasfar as.” D, always ut or qui (quae, quod) when the sentence with — expresses the purpose, condition, aim, effect, surmise, permission, encouragement, wish or command, as subject or object, or as additional clause; after is sum, non is sum, talis, qualis, is (such a one), ejusmodi, etc.; also qui, etc. (ut is, etc.), after tam, tantus, generally after negations, after quis? and after comparatives with quam, when these words express the degree, measure, up to which anything is said to possess a certain quality; and after nouns to express a purpose (e.g. Caesar sent messengers — they might say, Caesar nuntios misit qui dicerent); but ut is, etc., to express result; — not, after “to fear, to be afraid,” etc., ne nom. seldom ut, and — alone, ne; only — not, — by any means, ut ne (ne being placed before — which is prevented), e.g. ut hoc ne facerem (= he took care —, etc.); I say — . . . not, etc., by nego with accus. and infin., e.g. he asserts — there are no gods, deos esse negat. E, — in exclamations, 1, when we express a wish, oh — ! ut ! utinam ! o si (see Oh); God grant —, etc., facit Deus, ut, etc.; — not ! utinam ne ! 2, in general exclamations, by accus. and infin. (which apparently is not governed by any preceding verb), e.g. me miserum ! te in tantas aerumnas propter me incidisse !
